Anne Kerbrat, M.A. is a highly respected certified coach and consultant with over 15 years' experience. She works collaboratively with executives, directors, and managers in a variety of industries to facilitate change and growth throughout the organization.

Using methods that engage all stakeholders, Anne develops leaders and teams that work together to co-create simple solutions to complex problems. She coaches both individuals and teams to provide a framework for action and accountability that ultimately transforms the organization from within by increasing trust and decreasing conflict.

Anne focuses her executive coaching and consulting on fostering leadership skills in complex and challenging organizational settings. The leadership education programs she has developed and implemented have proven effective because they focus on both relationships and results.

Other areas of expertise include team development, facilitation, interpersonal communication, managing difficult conversations, leadership presence, and personal branding, as well as emotional intelligence, and creating peak performance. In addition to her work in healthcare, Anne's client industries have included financial services, commercial insurance, construction, retail, food service/restaurant, legal, technology and nonprofit.

Anne is a professor at Pepperdine University Graduate School of Education and Psychology where she developed and now teaches a Master's level course in Interpersonal Skills and Group Facilitation. She is also on the faculty at Brandman University's Leadership Development Institute where she authored and now interactively teaches leadership training on Emotional Intelligence to organizational clients.

Anne's background in psychology, coupled with her professional coaching and consulting experience, provide a unique blend of knowledge and skills that come together to create a highly effective coach and facilitator.
